A Stone-Age Man.

Professor J. S. Newberry lately exhibited to the members of the Lycenin of Natural History of this city a photograph of the skeleton of a stone-age man recently discovered The remains were found in the eavern of Barma, which was partially destroyed by the entting of the railway from Mentone to Ventimiglia. Formerly its entrance was concealed by an immense carob tree; afterward it was obstructed by a lime smoke of whose tires the roof hashecome entire blackened. The skeleton lay in an inclined position and in an attitude of repose. Its legs were crossed; its arms folded near the head; its ribs being too weak to resist the pressure of the earth were scattered a great quantity of thint tools, some of the largest size ever discovered, such as knives, punches, needles, batchets, and bodkins of

I consider them a valuable feed for stock, taking into consideration how cheaply they them in my apple dry house some American Watch Co., N. N. for market, and was offered five cents per pound. I found that a green pumpkin weighing from fifteen to twenty pounds would make about one pound of well dressed dry pumpkin, and that it would pay better to dry them for my hogs (as it could be done very cheap) than it would to sell. I soaked the drypumpkin in milk, and fed the same to the hogs; they gained fast. I also dried the forty which I wintered never did new grade made by the hetter.
